

My reason for supporting internet neutrality is short and sweet.

I can afford internet access and would likely not be affected if I was charged more for it. In writing this comment, I speak for all of the folks who might not be able to afford a steady internet connection. The single mother who is attending community college to get ahead and needs internet at home so she can stay with her children at night. The college kids living off campus who are taking out student loans and studying for a better future. And the elders living on Social Security who are using the internet to connect with their grandchildren and keep their brain active in their later years.
